Self-deception and delusions The simple fact is that we all are under cognitive dissonance, because we are all lying to ourselves. An article in the New Scientist last year looked at the many ways in which we deceive ourselves and why. Neuroscience in the past 20 years has revealed that our perceptions are not as good as we think they are.

A delusion is a belief held by an individual or group that is demonstrably false, patently untrue, impossible, fanciful, or self-deceptive. A person with delusions, however, often has complete...

The Psychology of Delusions | Psychology Today

In this exercise, self-deception is revealed as a demanding notion. There are many ways short of self-deception that motivation may play a role in a subject's arriving at a false belief. The cases of delusion that are most clearly examples of self-deception according to Mele's account are those in which motivational bias makes a substantial contribution to the second factor in the aetiology of the delusion.
